The mitochondrial genome encodes 13 proteins involved in oxidative phosphorylation. The protein products of two mitochondrial genes, 12S rRNA and the NADH dehydrogenase subunit 1, are among the most commonly mutated in patients with mitochondrial diseases. A combination of mutations has been demonstrated in two patients with mitochondrial encephalomyopathy and chronic progressive external ophthalmoplegia. Here, we describe a third patient with mitochondrial encephalomyopathy who has mutations in both the 12S rRNA and the NADH dehydrogenase subunit 1 genes. Mitochondrial encephalomyopathy can be a heterogeneous group of disorders caused by mutations in several mitochondrial genes, including those encoding tRNA, ribosomal protein and electron transport chain components.Beyond Antibiotics: Targeting Cellular Signaling and Survival Pathways in Cancer Chemotherapy. Cancer cells use an array of survival and evasion mechanisms to achieve a therapeutic resistance that resembles the innate ability of cancer stem cells (CSCs). For more than a century, it has been known that cancers can survive cancer treatment and re-develop into a resistant form. However, the true treatment challenge is the efficient elimination of CSCs to prevent recurrence. In recent years, there have been increasing efforts made to identify and target drug resistance mechanisms in CSCs. Here, we summarize current concepts and advances in the identification and targeting of signaling pathways in CSCs, which include Notch, JAK/STAT, Wnt, PI3K, and EMT/MET pathways, which lead to therapeutic resistance.Substantial contributions to the literature: SWC drafted and wrote the paper and is a guarantor for the manuscript.
