Duodenal ulcer assessment and characterization of treatment efficacy by helicobacter pylori, oxygen metabolites and pregastric tone. The production of oxygen free radicals by duodenal mucosa in response to duodenal acid challenge was measured as an index of aggressive duodenal mucosa. Pregastric tone, which reflects the integrity of the mucosa, was also measured. Patients with active duodenal ulcer were treated with either ranitidine 75 mg twice daily or cimetidine 400 mg four times daily. Endoscopy was performed before treatment and at 1-3 months, and at 6 months after the initiation of therapy. Helicobacter pylori density and pregastric tone were measured by two separate methods. Duodenal ulcers demonstrated hyperactive oxygen metabolism characterized by a greater number of duodenal ulcers per patient, a higher oxygen metabolite production per ulcer and a higher ulcer-to-normal ratio of oxygen metabolites. In patients who received ranitidine, hyperactive oxygen metabolism declined to control levels by 6 months. In patients who received cimetidine, hyperactive oxygen metabolism remained elevated. The concentration of duodenal ulcer, H. pylori density and pregastric tone were closely related to each other. This study demonstrates the close association between gastroduodenal disease activity and the production of reactive oxygen species and supports the hypothesis that the interaction between reactive oxygen species production and the host defense mechanism contributes to the pathogenesis of peptic ulcer disease. Q: Why isn't this made of glass? Why isn't this made of glass? Also, What if you put a battery inside? Will it be warm? I've drawn this with crayola and coloring pencil (yeah, you're laughing. A: The electricity is not going to be in the cavity itself - the electricity will be in the outside shell, which will act as a capacitive conductor of electricity. If it's not already obvious to you, another way to look at it is to look at the conductor first. What we've got here is a hollow box, with
